

Switching from the traditional incandescent light bulbs to CFLs is a change consumers make to be more energy-efficient at home. According to the EPA's Energy Star® Program, if every American switched out one regular, incandescent light bulb for a compact-fluorescent light (CFL) bulb, it would prevent more than $600 million in annual energy costs and prevent greenhouse gases equivalent to the emissions from 800,000 cars.

However, CFLs contain small amounts of mercury in each bulb and should not be thrown into the any trash or recycling container.
